AGRICULTURAL Sowing Clover Seed.

Mr. Editor.—There is time for everything; and therefore there is a proper time for sowing clover seen. Now some farmers suppose the best 3700 Facts for The PEOPLE, time for sowing it is immediately after harrowing in the oats or rye; the seed is to be sown after this process and harrowed over. This makes extra labor without compensating re-ults. Other farmers finish the harrowing in their oats or rye: then sow the clover seed, and pass the rellers over the field. This answers an excellent purpose, when the season is wet, or rains are frequent, and of course the surface of the ground is moist; the seed germinates and

But I am persuaded that the best time to sow clover is after the fall of much rain. I had a large field which I wished to seed with clover. Part of this field had in the previous autumn been sown with rve. Much rain fell in the Spring so that the surface of the ground was beaten very hard. This part of the field I sowed with clover seed about the time I sowed the other part. This latter part had just been sowed with oats. Now mark the result. Judge of my surprise on harvesting my crops to find the clover on the part where the rye was, decidedly better than on the part where the cats were; and yet the soil in the former case was no better than in the latter.

Some farmers pretend to say that the proper time to sow, is in the "old of the moon," but I have never found that time of any benefit to the springing and growth of grass and

Under these circumstances a man will collect the heads as fast as a man can thrash the mown clover.
